Name(s): Rob Klavins, Kris Stein

Summary of comments: phone call

Rob contacted Kris – was upset that the Forest Service was planning to sign the project decision. Said that he was planning to call a reporter and hoped we would hold off signing so that he had something good to tell her. Felt no collaboration had been done and that a couple of field trips did not count toward collaboration; too one-sided.

Kris shared that the Forest Service had heard his input from the letters and field visit and had incorporated some into the project design. Recreation impacts seemed to be a primary concern expressed during the field visit – the project added some design features to mitigate recreation impacts. Rob said recreation was not his concern. He asked how we had addressed his concerns. Kris asked him to clarify his concerns so they could discuss them. Rob became frustrated and said if Kris didn't know his concerns then how had she addressed them. He said that he did not support the proposed logging, even though he acknowledged it would not occur in old growth. He asked if we had addressed his concerns why did we still propose logging. Kris replied, "because it is not all about you." Rob lost his temper and yelled that he wished a reporter had heard that; that showed the Forest Service doesn't know how to collaborate.

After Rob calmed down, Kris apologized for making him upset, and clarified her statement was meant to indicate that many perspectives had to be considered, not just Rob's.

Discussed Kris meeting with Rob and Brian (HCPC) so that she could hear their perspective on the project. Rob said the meeting would not be to hear their perspectives but to talk about how to design a collaborative process, and that he would bring some other landowners who could also share that perspective.
